Security assurance across the Maritime Trading Systems is a critical factor for national business and international trade.

The Maritime Trading Systems is a complex system and is not limited to the marine movement of freight, it involves the full spectrum of Supply Chain which includes manufacturers, transportation companies, freight agents, ports and port facilities, shipping companies and vessels.

The threat of Maritime violence threatens the national, regional and international trade as well as poses a risk to national and international security. The formation of a terrorism-piracy nexus was, and still is, seen as a potential alarming development.

The threat from the maritime domain may come in various forms and includes terrorist attack, illegal immigration, contraband, weapons or explosives may be concealed in containers, ships may be used as weapons to destroy critical infrastructure, terrorists may illegally cross the borders to launch attacks or acts of piracy at sea.

The international trade is heavily reliant on safe and open waterways and oceans, and therefore the supply chain stake holders are increasingly being forced to participate in the security scheme and face a large number of regulations and private initiatives prescribing measures to be taken in order to raise the level of supply chain security.
